Income inequality in Bay Area among highest in the nation

By Mutia Kendall

The San Francisco and San Jose metro areas have two of the highest set levels of income inequality in the country, according to a recent study — a disturbing distinction that helps explain why it’s so hard for many to afford housing here.

In the San Francisco area, while the average salary is $149,600, the average for those earning less than $25,000 is $55,200, according to a new analysis of data from 2016 released this month.

The San Jose area, which includes all of Santa Clara County, ranked next, with the region’s highest earners making 10.5 times more than their lowest earners.

In the San Jose area, the gap between the highest and lowest earners was especially wide. The average salary of high earners increased by more than $100,000, while the salaries of low earners crept up by less than $2,000.

Mueller indicts 13 Russians

A grand jury in the Justice Department indicted 13 Russians Friday in a wide-ranging scheme to criminally interfere with the 2016 U.S. presidential election.

The indictment, unsealed Friday in Washington, accuses the 13 Russians of criminally interfering with the 2016 U.S. presidential election, according to the Justice Department.

The indictment names four companies in the indictment as the basis of an ambitious effort to trick Americans online into following and promoting Russian-funded propaganda that pushed 2016 votes for then-President Donald Trump and away from Democratic rival Hillary Clinton.
